Writing for History

Writing History

- Writing for a purpose, not to entertain
- Not just informative, expository writing
- Also not quite persuasive writing as you would do in English
- Somewhere in between... a technical style of writing
- Not to say it shouldn't be interesting, but that it is a different thing than you have learned before.

Three Types of History

- Narrative – To relate the story of a particular event or series of events
- Descriptive – To paint a complete picture of a place, people, or point in time
- Argumentative – To propose and defend a point of view regarding historical relationships and processes

In this class, yours will nearly always be Argumentative

What it is NOT

- Grandiose, flowery statements
 - “Throughout time there have been many questions of history that have puzzled and befuddled historians.”
- Unsupported generalizations
 - “Native Americans revered the land and treated nature with respect”

What it is NOT

- Anachronistic judgments (Presentism)
 - “European settlers in the 17th century were pretty stupid not to realize they could bring deadly disease and wipe out Native populations.”
- Overlong summaries or recitations of facts.
 - Don't mistake vomiting facts for argument!!!

So what's your point?

- Argumentation means you are trying to support a particular position on or interpretation of a historical event or question.
- A good argument is:
 - Organized and logical
 - Based on evidence
 - Built around a central assertion or thesis

Points of Style

- ALWAYS use past tense!!!
- ALWAYS use active voice!!!
- ALWAYS use third person!!!
 - NEVER say “I,” “me,” “myself,” etc.
- NEVER use jargon, slang, or informal language
